ST. CROIX -- Sen. Terrence "Positive" Nelson officially introduced his medicinal marijuana legislation at a press conference on Tuesday, following an expedition to Washington State and Colorado, where the senator and his delegation met with government officials, leaders in the field of medicinal marijuana, and other advocates.

I really felt the need to play Peter Tosh's song, "Legalize It" as I walked up, but I know my staff would not permit me, but I just had to share that with you.
-- Sen. Terrence "Positive" Nelson.

Held at the Curriculum Center located west of the St. Croix Central High School at 10:00 a.m., Nelson, along with members of the expedition, including St. Thomas Sen. Tregenza Roach, Dr. Manuel Da Motta, D.O., and others, spoke about their experience, making known that they were now stronger advocates of the drug than before the trip.

"This trip took me on a spiritual expedition," Nelson said, "I'm having a spiritual experience, people, and it's beautiful. Nelson said before embarking on the journey, he thought he was liberal in his thinking, "but I've experienced it at another level. I mean, it's changing and it's causing me to recalibrate my position on some issues."

The six-term senator said the bill will be introduced to the 31st Legislature at the end of May. The expedition, he added, was useful in helping draft a better bill -- taking away the good parts of what has worked on the U.S. mainland, while steering clear from what has not.

At one point during his talk, Nelson held up a small canister containing a liquid form of medicinal marijuana.

"Should somebody be locked up for this?" Nelson asked. "This is cannabis oil, this isn't smoking weed. This is cannabis oil that's been proven to work -- made from a plant."

Nelson said the oil was made by pressing marijuana leaves, and repeatedly asked the question: why should someone be locked up for marijuana oil, when "it's not something you smoke," but rather a liquid applied underneath the tongue.

"Having seen upfront what this does, how can we not?" he asked.

Sen. Roach, who was only able to make the Colorado leg of the expedition, called the trip a meaningful opportunity, and said he embarked on the experience not as an advocate for medicinal marijuana nor the full legalization of the drug, but because the people of the territory voted in a referendum in favor of creating a medicinal marijuana industry here.

"I do not believe people should ever be afraid of learning," Roach said. "Because when I came back, I was even more convinced about the medicinal benefits and the value of medicinal marijuana as an industry."

Using statistics, Roach said 23 states have already legalized medicinal marijuana; five, including the District of Columbia, have outright legalized the drug, and on Tuesday, the Texas House of Representatives passed a measure for full legalization.

"So, literally, this is not going to turn back," Roach said.

Roach did, however, point out some federal restrictions that must be looked at when crafting the local legislation.

For example, U.S. banks are not allowed to take monies made from the medicinal marijuana industry because they are members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC). Under federal law, marijuana is treated like every other controlled substance such as cocaine and heroine, according to Americans for Safe Access, an organization created to advance legal medical marijuana.

When asked about the potential problem of having thousands of dollars being stored in the homes of business owners in the territory because the banks are forbidden from accepting money from the industry, Nelson said people with money usually find ways to make things happen.

The senator also encouraged the community to continue being strong advocates of the local medicinal marijuana movement, applauded those who recently picketed Governor Kenneth Mapp at the Juan F. Luis Hospital and Medical Center, and said his office will be hosting some rallies in the near future.

On the expedition, the delegation met with a total of 17 private and governmental agencies, 16 facilities ranging from dispensaries/pharmacies, store fronts, farms, testing labs, extraction labs, and companies that create the machines for the medicinal marijuana industry.

The group also sat in on a lecture on terpenes, given by Dr. Ethan Russo, and attended at least 3 seminars with topics ranging from, 'The Future of Legal Cannabis in America', to 'The Emerging Edibles Industry'.
